Supporting Military Children During Transitions

There are multiple transitions military families face. Transitions occur when a parent is deployed, when they return, and when the family moves to a new location. These transitions can be challenging for our classrooms. In the previous modules, we've learned that military children often attend 6-8 schools before graduating high school. The student's education experience. America's military-connected children can experience academic and social, emotional challenges as they transition from one school to another. These transitions create challenges since schools often have differing cultures, curricula, standards, course offerings, schedules, and expectations. Checklists and to-do lists designed to assist families during deployments and relocations are easily found on military webpages; however, they can be especially daunting. Parents often cite changing schools as the most stressful part of relocating. While the Military Interstate Children's Compact Commission (MCCC) provides additional measures schools can take steps to support families during all stages of transition.

Some of the challenges military children face deal with mobility, deployment, and exposure to trauma. Please watch this short video on the

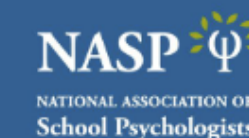

Supporting Military Children During Times of Global Crisis

Any time news of a war or crisis breaks out across the globe, military kids aren't thinking only of that specific war or crisis. They are also thinking about their parents' safety. Most children hear about war or other conflicts from the news or from conversation with others and may wonder if and when their parent will be deployed. They have the additional stressor of wondering if and when their parent will be deployed. Knowing this, there are supports educators can provide military connected students. We've included many here for you. For more information or support.

As you download and use these resources, keep in mind the number one way to help military children during a time of global crisis is to provide them with a safe and supportive environment.
